Resisting ethnic inequities in advanced breast cancer: a call to action

Irene Kereama-Royal, Sara Jones, Elisa Lavelle Wijohn, Claire Doole, Elisabeth Burgess, Heather Came

ABSTRACT

Māori women with advanced breast cancer are less than half as likely as their Pākehā counterparts to reach the five-year survival mark. We argue that this inequity is unacceptable. We trace the inequity back to i) inadequate screening and risk assessment, ii) lack of support for patient navigators, iii) failure to offer accessible state-of-the-art treatments, and iv) delays in receiving life-prolonging care. We posit that each of these factors is a site of institutional racism and privilege as they cause Māori women to experience significantly worse outcomes than non-Māori. In the active pursuit of justice, cancer survivors, women living with cancer and their supporters across the country have been engaging in passionate advocacy to address inequities. As the Ministry of Health develops a new cancer control plan, in this viewpoint opinion piece, we seek to amplify these distressing inequities and offer evidence-based recommendations to improve the quality of care and ultimately survival rates. Breast cancer inequities are modifiable. We recommend prioritising breast cancer screening and risk assessment for Māori women, reducing treatment delays, providing Māori-centred patient navigation, increasing funding for treatments and drugs to align with the OECD standard of care, and holding health providers accountable for ethnic inequities. We call on policy makers drafting the new cancer control strategy, and those working across the cancer continuum, to take action to improve breast cancer outcomes so Māori women will gain valuable life-years.

Cancer is the leading cause of death in Aotearoa New Zealand.¹ There are systemic ethnic inequities across the cancer continuum, from diagnosis and existing treatment, through to mortality rates.² This pattern is repeated within advanced breast cancer (ABC), which is the focus of this paper.³ Research commissioned by the Breast Cancer Foundation New Zealand found Māori women in Aotearoa with a diagnosis of ABC (stage IV) have a 3% five-year survival rates while New Zealand European women have a 15% survival rate.⁴ The evidence suggests these rates persist even when all factors except ethnicity are controlled for.⁵ As Wika Mulholland, while advocating on behalf of women with ABC, highlighted in her 13 March 2019 speech, Select Committee submission, we need to recognise that Māori women are the heart of the whānau and wider community and we need to keep them well.

Through its Treaty of Waitangi international human rights agreements and core health policy and legislation, the New Zealand Government has an obligation to protect and promote Māori health and promote health equity.^{6,7} Systemic ethnic inequities in cancer outcomes suggest a failure of the Ministry of Health in its role of stewardship.⁸ If, as the data suggest, all other factors are controlled for and ethnic inequities persist, we argue it is likely to be institutional racism—a pattern of behaviour that benefits one ethnic group and disadvantages another. Institutional racism can manifest through policy, investment decisions, mono-cultural structures and practices. Critically, racism does not need to be intentional.

In this viewpoint paper, written by Māori and non-Māori breast cancer survivors (and allies), we overview some of the modifiable contributing factors to ethnic inequities experienced by Māori in ABC. Our focus
